Kenya replaces top-rank police in major reform effort

By: Peter Greste

Nairobi -- The government in Kenya has replaced almost all of the country's most senior police officers in what analysts say could be the start of major reform.

Of all the Kenyan institutions needing reform, the police have been at the top of the list. In the wave of reflection that followed the rioting over the disputed elections, the police were blamed for killing hundreds. Human rights groups have consistently argued that there can be no justice in Kenya without complete reform of the police service. Tuesday's announcement seems to answer that call and human rights agencies have cautiously welcomed the changes.

The most significant change is the removal of Major General Hussein Ali -- the ex-police commissioner has been moved to a position at the Post Office. Human rights and security analysts say he was the major obstacle to reform.

His replacement is the respected Mathew Iteere, who used to command the elite General Services Unit - the police troop often called in to control civil unrest.
